Acts 4.32-35

A reflection by Revd Nick Bird

I absolutely love the Easter season. Lent, Holy Week and Easter Day all have their own special qualities, but it is the period after Easter that does something for me. Perhaps it ties in with the time of year, the spring rush, the sap rising in the soul, but there is a joy and lightness for me at this time of year.

For the early church there is something of a short, golden age. In recent weeks there has been a series of reports on historic abuse in the Church of England, and there is much to be ashamed about. Clericalism (the exaggerated deference toward those who wear funny collars, and the presumption of superiority by those who do dress in this odd way) has fed into this unhealthy culture that sometimes makes one wonder as to whether the church has ceased to be such a useful tool of the Kingdom of God.

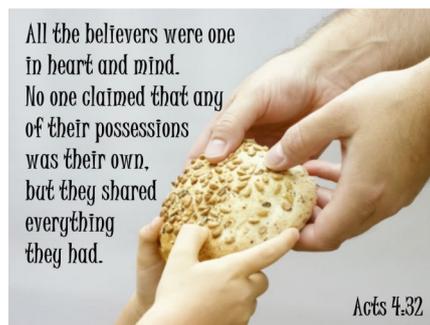

But returning to the scriptures and the stories of the early church, there are a number of accounts of disagreement, betrayal, fraud, deception and more. The stinging epistles suggesting that there were certain things that Christian folk should not be doing would only be written in response to the fact that it was happening already. 1 Corinthians 13 was not written because faithful folk in all perpetuity needed to read something uplifting about love, but because the church in Corinth was making such a mess of things in such unlovely ways (thank you Corinthians).

But in chapter 4 of the book of Acts we read of a brief moment of perfection: everyone was of one heart and mind, all property and possessions were held in common, land and houses were sold and the proceeds distributed to any who were in need.

Service was given, prayers were said, and 'great grace was upon them all'. It seemed only to last for a moment, but there was a glimpse of Eden and the heavenly city, all rolled into one.

The trials, tribulations and transcendent moments in the life of the early church are both an inspiration and a sign. The Spirit is moving across the land, lives are changed, sacrifices are made, renunciation is offered, and the call is heard that still demands my soul, my life, my all.
